

Georges Michelson Dupont

In the early 60s, Jacques Dupont, Georges' father, gave his son The Urantia Book. At the time it was called La Cosmogonie d'Urantia, published in 3 volumes. But at 13, his interest lay elsewhere.

In the mid-70s, Georges went through a deep and serious existential crisis. One evening, sitting on his bed, he wept. Suddenly he realised that the materialistic values on which his life was based were illusory, and that their pursuit would bring him nothing but grief and unhappiness.

Glancing at the bookshelf, he saw the 3 volumes of the Cosmogony facing him. Something inexplicable compelled him to pick them up. So he picked up volume 1 and began to read. And then something inexpressible happened: he was overcome by a luminous peace. His anguish had been replaced by the certainty that everything was going to change as long as he agreed to give himself over to this spiritual emotion that now inhabited him, rather like the Prodigal Son returning to his Father.

It was decided, he would read this big blue book to the end.

A year later, realising how much the Revelation had changed his life and his way of life, Georges understood the importance of spreading the teachings of the Revelation for the evolution of our planet. So he and his wife Marlène decided to get personally and socially involved by organising seminars, meetings and conferences.

They have been running a study group in their home since the 1980s.

Georges has been a trustee of Urantia Foundation since 1995. He was its International Vice-President. He is also in charge of translations and co-founder of the UBIS school.

Georges and his wife Marlène are retired from industry; they live in Recloses near Paris in France. They have two grown-up daughters and a granddaughter.
